What might a judge be looking for?

Remember, the judge will try to interpret the image in the way, he hopes, you intended. If you can, use your title to provide a clue, but keep it short! Good judges want to see the photographer making full use of the camera's viewfinder. He may look to see if unwanted 'highlights' have been avoided particularly around the edges as these tend to draw the viewer's eye away from the main subject matter. Is the main subject showing to its best advantage and has the best use been made of the available light and its direction? Is the image clear, clean and simple? Has the main object of interest been placed in the strongest position, usually on the 'thirds'?
